- 1 What can be inferred about the environmental impact of renewable energy production compared to traditional fossil fuels?

Renewable energy production is comparatively less harmful to the environment, but it is not completely environmental friendly. Production of renewable energy devices like solar panels, wind turbines and batteries relies heavily on minerals extracted through mining which operates on fossil fuels. Moreover, their disposal also contribute solid waste pollution. Therefore, renewable resources are not completely safe for environment and consistent research is required to improve their efficiency.

Electric vehicles (EVs) are not fully environmental friendly as they require raw materials and minerals extraction for their production. One of the essential component, battery, uses lithium-ion extracted ~~from~~ through mining. Moreover, they also require electric charge which is dependent on electricity produced by fossil fuels.

3. What challenge is associated with the disposal of renewable energy systems after their lifespan ends?

Renewable energy systems have limited lifespan, typically around 30-40 years. After completion of their lifespan they become useless, leading to solid waste management issues. Recycling process is not simple as they accumulate toxic materials.

- 4) Why does the articles suggest that renewable energy is not entirely pollution-free during its operational phase?

The article suggest that renewable energy is not entirely pollution-free during its operational phase because of their reliance on battery for energy storage. These batteries rely heavily on lithium and cobalt, which are extracted from earth through ~~poor~~ practices like mining which is harmful to environment.

5. How does article propose addressing the limitations of renewable energy?

The article suggests that a balanced approach should be adopted to mitigate the limitations of renewable energy.
