Oratory : A Diminishing Art

The future of oratory is uncertain. Once regarded as a prestigious and valuable art, it has significantly declined in modern times. In ancient days, the words were shaped for the lasting impact by the orator like Demosthenes, but today, the rise of writing press and broadcasting and modern day conversational style have shifted the focus from eloquence of delivery to the substance of the message, reducing interest in good public speaking. However, Sir Winston Churchill stand out as a remarkable orator from the golden age of oratory. His speeches were characterized by coherence and eloquence, addressing significant national and international issues. They have become an integral part of history, immortalizing Churchill as one of the greatest figure of his age.
