Question 3

a) What can be inferred about the environmental impact of renewable energy production compared to traditional fossil fuels?

Considering that renewable energy has no negative environmental impact is an overstatement. The production of renewable energy requires a significant quantity of resources extracted from the earth's surface. These extractions entail harmful mining practices and manufacturing them produces greenhouse gases, similar to those of fossil fuel emissions.

b) How far are the electric vehicles (EVs) environmentally friendly?

Electric vehicles are environmentally friendly but not completely. The lithium-ion batteries installed in them require intensive mining, which is harmful for the earth. Moreover, ~~if~~ electricity used to charge EVs <sup>is</sup> mostly sourced from fossil fuels, which reduces their environmental benefits. Lastly, their disposals are another issue, which, if recycled improperly, may lead to toxic waste.

c) What challenge is associated with the disposal of renewable energy systems after their lifespan ends?

Renewable energy systems have an extended period of life. When they depreciate fully, their disposals become a concern. This is because of the fact that their disposals are ~~not~~ <sup>neither</sup> a <sup>simple</sup> straightforward process and ~~usually~~ <sup>not</sup> very commonly practiced, which leads to accumulation of toxic wastes. In order to get the most of it, a robust infrastructure is required for managing the influx of discarded materials.

Why does the article suggest that renewable energy is not entirely pollution-free during its operational phases?

The article says that renewable energy sources are not pollution immune. They require fossil fuel plants for backups and are reliant on battery storage. Both <sup>have</sup> ~~having~~ their own environmental drawbacks, which includes greenhouse emissions, <sup>soil erosion, deforestation</sup> environment degradation and human rights <sup>major</sup> abuses. Renewable energy does reduce <sup>major</sup> reliance on fossil fuels, but is not completely environment friendly.

How does the article propose addressing the limitations of renewable energy?

It is suggested to first accept the fact that renewable energy sources are not completely environment safe, but relatively less dangerous than non-renewable energy sources. Moreover, a robust disposal mechanism is required to mitigate the limitations of renewable sources. Lastly, it is suggested to have realistic expectations from it.
