

Part II

Q#02:

Modern civilization, while dazzling with rapid progress, wealth, and invention, conceals a silent moral erosion. This pursuit of material success now overrides conscience, integrity and human connection. Institutions once rooted in virtue - home, education and faith are transactional and values are replaced by profit. As abundance grows, inner emptiness deepens. Without a revival of moral clarity, this shining age may script humanity's quiet downfall beneath the illusion of prosperity.

Q #03: Q/A

1. Arab leaders changed their view of Pakistan because they were impressed by the country's advanced skills in digital warfare and its disciplined and strategic control improved Pakistan's standing with them, turning their earlier disdain into a new respect.

2. The blackout in Delhi disrupted communications and caused panic across the Indian Capital. This sudden disruption created psychological shock, revealing the vulnerability of India's infrastructure and diminishing its sense of security and control during the conflict.

3. If Pakistan had not launched digital warfare, the conflict would likely have remained a conventional military engagement. Both sides would rely on traditional forces. India might have escalated the conflict further and led to increased international pressure against Pakistan instead.

TRANSLATION:

Margrete is an old lady who used to go to the station daily to hear the declaration of "Mundagap" in the voice of her late husband, "Oswald Lorange". This declaration was recorded in the era of 1970 and Margrete felt nearness by hearing this after the death of her husband "Oswald Lorange".

In 2012, when this sound was changed ~~to~~ in the form of electronic recording, Margrete contacted Transport for London. When the organization became aware of her emotions, it restored her husband's voice. Now, everyday, the announcements are made in that same loving voice.
