

Women Empowerment

The hands that rock the cradle, the procreators, the mother of tomorrow, a woman shapes the destiny of the civilizations.

This shows the importance of women in society, capable of impacting generations, and nourishing future leaders. Women are an essential component of society, and it is important to empower them. Empowering women is like empowering the whole society.

Women's empowerment refers to the giving them the choice and authority for decision making, allowing them to do what they want.

Furthermore, women's empowerment has made significant progress over the years and it is still an ongoing process. There are several ways to empower women by providing them with quality education, literacy, training, and self-awareness.

Additionally, there are specific areas that need to be focused on, which can ultimately help women in uplifting and making progress. Social empowerment is one of the crucial needs, as it teaches women to respond to certain situations like marriage, education, and conceiving a child, making them confident enough to raise their voice for their needs.

Similarly, political empowerment is required to make women feel confident in their decisions.

Women's participation in policy making, as senators, parliamentarians, and state representatives can be possible if women are taught to claim their rights, which they deserve. Moreover, economic empowerment is important to make women independent, ensuring equal access to work opportunities. Women contribute to more than 50% of the world's population. Their participation in GDP can bring enormous results. In a similar manner, educational empowerment is of utmost importance, as it develops a sense of awareness among the women and prepares them to face the world and respond to situations without fear and with boldness. The women's literacy rate is low as compared to men's literacy rate worldwide, specially in rural and underdeveloped countries. Besides, psychological empowerment is of paramount significance. Women are often harassed in the work-place, education sector and even at home. Ironically, domestic violence still exists today, and it needs to be addressed as it makes women feel vulnerable. Several progress has been made to empower women, and organizations are working to bring significant changes to society. These organizations include UN Women, Global Fund for Women, Women for Women International, Women's World

Banking, Women's Development Organization, and many more. Besides this, several NGOs are working throughout the world to uplift women's status in society and enable them to stand alongside men. Therefore, women's empowerment is crucial and numerous steps should be taken to address this issue, ensuring easy access to opportunities for every woman.
