

Women Empowerment

Whole globe is in need to enhance women empowerment because it leads to economic growth, improved health outcomes and greater social stability. Empowered women are more likely to participate in the workforce, start business, and contribute to their communities economic development. As per UN women studies have shown that closing the gender gap in labor force participation could lead to significant increase in GDP, potentially by 30% or even 60%, in some countries. Women empowerment can improve access to quality healthcare, including reproductive health services, and reduce violence against women. As per the Borger project Women's empowerment is positively associated with an array of positive maternal and child health outcomes, such as improved maternal care, contraceptive use, child mortality and nutrition level. When women are empowered, they are more likely to participate in decision-making, advocate for their rights and influence policy. According to UNDP, having both men and women involved in decision making broadens the perspectives, increases creativity and innovations, diversifies the pool of talents and competence, reduces conflicts, and improves the process of decision-making. Due to the above mentioned reasons, empowering today's women is not just a choice but a moral imperative and a strategic necessity.
