1. Women Empowerment

Women Empowerment:

The Empowerment of Women means to grant equal rights to women that men have in the fields of politics, economics, social matters, education, family matters and even religious matters. Politically, women can be empowered by reserving seats for her in the national and the provincial assemblies. For instance,

Date:

Benazir Bhutto was the first Muslim woman politician from Pakistan. Similarly, women ought to be empowered in the field of economics that includes business sector, banking sector, and even in digital currency sector.

For example, Shaista Kitchen, a food chain in Abu Dhabi; Rahat bakers, a food chain in Pakistan; and Malis.B, a garments outlet chain is a best example for those who are reluctant to empower the women in field of business. Women also must be empowered to deal their social matters that may be right to many according to her own well, equal rights in decision making, and right to do a respectable job where she want. The women must also be encouraged to attain quality education in any field where she want. In particular,

Malala Yousafzai, a Pakistani Noble Prize laureate, attained education in Swat even when terrorism was at its zenith over there. It means she is the best example for women to attain education in any circumstances. The women also must be empowered in her family and religious matters. Both of these matters are interlinked with one another.

For instance, right of portion in father's wealth, right of Mehr, and other rights which religion has fixed for women. In a nutshell, women has to be empowered politically, economically, socially, educationally, religiously and in family matters. So, to expedite our nation's progress.
