Women Empowerment is a multifaceted phenomenon that has been a pressing issue for feminists since ages. There is not a single definition rather its nature is fluid. Historically, there has been many shifts in the narratives. Women have been historically suppressed and denied of any agency in the hands of patriarchally dominated society. They have always been considered weak, unwise and dependent. Even in religious discourse, women are shown as inferior. In ~~Bible~~, ~~even~~ Christianity, women are considered the reason behind the inflicted original sin on men. However, there has been a significant shift in the narrative in the recent years. Today's woman is no longer an oblivious woman who is ignorant of her rights. A major shift has been seen in the ways women resist to patriarchy - from passive aggression to active resistance. The shift is more evident in the literary and advertisement discourses. Although, there is a visible shift, eastern women face different unique challenges than western women. In the west, women face more subtle forms of dominance, whereas, in the east, it's more vivid. In the Eastern women experience empowerment in diverse forms as it is more personalized phenomenon.

than general. Many feminists believe that women have gained some autonomy over the years, but a deep analysis shows that women now are experiencing subtle patriarchal dominance. Today's modern independent woman is facing modern challenges limiting her empowerment. In the name of independence, they are objectified. She also has to carry the ^{two} fold burden of being a home-maker and career-maker as well. Moreover, the idea of alpha-woman is ripping women of their femininity and making them more vulnerable in fact. In a nutshell, women empowerment is not an ultimate goal or a product rather a process that every woman experience differently bound by her socio-economic realities.
