Title:

"The True Object of Men's Services"

For all well trained men, the true purpose of their services extends beyond mere financial gains, it lies in the deep satisfaction derived from their work. Just as a soldier's greatest reward is victory, not just his pay. Similarly, a preacher is not fascinated by money but he wants to preach to everyone. Same is the case with doctors, their driving force is not money but to cure unwell. All proficient men will always choose their work first and money second - though its importance cannot be denied but still it remains secondary to the satisfaction achieved from the work itself, which is their true priority.
