The ESSAY

With women comprising nearly 49.7% of the global population, empowering them is not a choice but a global necessity. Yet, according to the global gender report 2024, full gender parity will take over 131 years at the current pace. This stark reality demands immediate and meaningful action. Women empowerment refers to enabling women to have equal rights, opportunities, and control over their lives in all spheres including education, economy, politics and society. Globally, empowered women have transformed economies. For instance, if women participated equally in the global economy, it could add $28 trillion ^{good well incorporated data} to the world GDP by the end of 2025 (McKinsey Global Institute).

In Pakistan, where women make up about 49.1% of the population, their labour force participation is only around 20.1%. It is mostly due to socio-cultural barriers, lack of education, and limited access to ^{u r quite substantive in your argument} the resources.

Educated and economically independent women reduce poverty, improve family health, and uplift entire communities. For example, studies show that children of educated mothers are twice as likely to survive past age five.

Furthermore, political representation of women ensures inclusive policy-making, yet in many countries, women hold less than 25% of parliamentary seats.

Empowering women through education, legal rights, financial access, and leadership roles creates ripple effects that uplift nations.

In conclusion, no nation can prosper by ignoring half of its population. Women empowerment is not merely a social goal rather it is an economic strategy, a political necessity, and a moral obligation to ensure a just, progressive, and sustainable future.
