

(A)

When the powerful economies moulded the global financial system according to their interests then for the developing countries economic sovereignty has remained a dream. International financial institutions impose such conditions for the pretexts of loan that drag the debtor country towards further dependency instead of economic stability. This phenomena has ~~given~~^{given} birth to a new colonial system where for the sake of rule gun is not a weapon but currency, interest, and market are. Today, there is a huge challenge for global nations to create a such equilibrium between progress and sovereignty that did not comply the ~~national interest~~ over national interest according to global pressure.

(B)
