Question no: 1(a)

Punctuation:

It was almost midnight when the young scholar returned to his rooms. He had left them in a state of revolt: piles of books lay like islands in a turbulent sea, papers fluttered on the floor as if impatient to be read and on the desk - a single lamp burned its halo, warning a photograph of his grandmother, which seemed to smile even in such disorder. "Who would have thought she once paddled tales to children in the village?" He wondered, "Would she have laughed at his neat theories, written now in the margins of a book?"

Part (B):

Narration :

John greeted Sara with Good afternoon and said that she was still buried in her books. He asked her to take a little rest and joined him for a walk along the river. Sara replied that she wished she could but the examination was hanging over her head and she felt every minute precious to her. John expressed with sigh that the examinations stole all the joy of youth and he could not understand how she endured such constant pressure. Sara replied in assertion that she did not work for examination but for the discipline and knowledge that came with sincere study. John argued that life was not all about books and seriousness as a weary mind became dull and unproductive. Sara replied that the temporary weariness was small price for the satisfaction of achieving what one had set one's heart upon.
