It was almost midnight when the young author returned to his rooms. He had left them in a state of revolt: piles of books lay like islands in a turbulent sea; papers fluttered on the floor as if impatient to be read; and on the desk, a single lamp burned its halo warming; a photograph of his grandmother which seemed to smile even in such a disorder. Who would have thought she once peddled tales to children in the village? He wondered would she have laughed at his neat theories written now in the margins of a book.

John greeted good afternoon to Sara and said that she had still buried in her books, he saw. Why she did not take a little break and join them for a walk along a river. Sara replied that she wished she could, the examination was hanging over her head, and every minute felt precious to her then. John exclaimed with a sigh that those examinations stole all the joy of youth. He can not understand how she endured such constant pressure. Sara explained that it was not merely the examination she worked for, but the discipline and knowledge that came with sincere study. John argued that yet life was not all books and seriousness; a weary mind grew dull and unproductive. Sara agreed and presented her view that she believed temporary weariness was a small price for the satisfaction of achieving what one had set his heart upon.
