Q1.:

(A) Translation-1

When world's largest economies shaped international financial system for their own benefits, financial independence was left as a dream for developing nations.

International financial organizations impose such conditionalities on their loans that impede a country's economic progress instead of ensuring sustainable growth. This system has created a new phenomenon where nations don't rule through traditional weapons but by achieving supremacy in currency, interest rates, and market competition. Today, it is a challenge for

United Nations (UNs) to perpetuate a balance between progress and sovereignty to protect nations from international pressures.

Modern technology has facilitated man, but simultaneously it raises questions about security and privacy concerns of the man. In this era of digital surveillance, some data base is storing information of every human being. Governments and corporations are transforming this acquired information into a powerful source that can even influence human behaviour. If it is not constrained through legal and ethic laws then in the future human may be called as free, but their freedom would merely be nothing more than a deceit.
