Q3

(1)

The rivals of Timothy Dexter were jealous of his success in trading and in order to humiliate him, they advised him to ship coal to Newcastle, England. This city was known for its endless supply of coal and the rivals knew it but their intention was his humiliation.

(2)

When Dexter's ship reached England, local production had been stopped by a miners' strike. This event led to a sudden shortage of coal. Thus there was a huge demand for coal and Dexter sold his entire cargo for a massive profit, leaving his rivals speechless.

(3)

The author implies that although Timothy Dexter was a fool and a genius, his luck always had an upper hand in business. Some of his many bizarre business decisions turned out to be the most profitable ones due to his luck and his confidence, though intelligence recommended otherwise.

(4)

Dexter's repeated success challenge conventional ideas about business wisdom and education as he had a little of both these. His luck and his confidence always prevailed indicating that one does not need to acquire proper business education and wisdom in order to be a successful businessman. But luck and confident decisions also play a major part in success.

(5)

Sometimes we do not see what we see. This proverb clearly depicts the nature of human perception. Dexter's rivals always underestimated him and thought him ^{of} as a foolish person but his success proved him a genius in business. Sometimes, being underestimated is the best advantage a man can have. Thus it can be inferred that human perception is not always a reality.
