Women empowerment is a fundamental pillar for sustainable development, fairness and progress in society and the economy. It means giving women equal rights, chances and the ability to make decisions in politics, work, and social spheres. According to World Bank, women make up almost half of the world's population but in many countries they still face problems in education, jobs, healthcare and leadership. UN Women reports that women do about two-thirds of the world's unpaid care work, which limits their chance to work in regular jobs. Helping women through education and skill development not only improves their lives but also helps the economy grow; studies show that closing a gap between men and women at work could raise global income a lot. Organizations like World Bank support programs for women such as giving access to money, helping start businesses, and making laws that protect women's rights. Also, when women take part in politics, it improves leadership because countries with more women leaders often have better social programs and less corruption. Even with progress, problems like gender-based violence, wage gaps and unfair treatment still exist, especially in developing countries. Women empowerment is not just
