Question - 2

Ironically, the more specialized knowledge humans are gaining the harder it has become to deal with daily problems. Humans are increasingly relying on specialists and not realizing expert in one domain is not necessarily equipped to handle life as a whole. Their specialized knowledge gives them a limited view. All disciplines reveal something but in isolation they represent a partial picture. Historically, humans lacked specialized knowledge, however, some ^{had} a holistic perspective of life. Over-reliance on specialists has weakened our thinking abilities. Humans rely on them as if living everyday life requires special skills. At present, the need is to develop generalists - who can move
