Q. 7

Literature is the vein of any society that reflects the moral and spiritual condition of the particular society.

It is to be considered, when there is a downfall of literature of a nation, the nation is about to face consequences. It is unfortunate that it is no longer valued rather treated as a showoff. Those who considered it a burden and mock it or in fact digging their own graves. True literature does not mean silencing the voice of truth or bowing before tyranny, it means having the courage to speak out against injustice and oppression. But in our age so called literary writer has become empty formalism - where people are obsessed with outward courtesy while running blind to moral decay. They stay busy pleasing the powerful and flattering the elite. Such literature is a betrayal of humanity and a crime against the nation.

- i). The author identifies the basic misunderstanding, the relationship between tradition and progress. The author believes that this misunderstanding has made our culture poor and poisoned it. He advocates that this error is dangerous as it is often taught to see these two forces are always fighting each other. Tradition is seen as the past trying to stop new ideas while progress is seen as the energy of the future trying to break free from old rules.

ii). The author uses examples from the human history to challenge the idea of progress requires abandoning the past. He mentions Historical events like European Renaissance, Scientific revolution and even Religious reforms how they haven't ignored the past but have used it in a new creative way.

iii). The author describes tradition as "a living conversation across generations" rather than a static repository of dead customs because he thinks of it as a dialogue that questions the past and challenges and when this conversation is cut off we isolate ourselves from history and become rootless rather than progressing in the right way.

iv). The paradox here is that people are looking for wide for meaning, purpose and identity in new spiritual practices, therapies or political ideas while ignoring the very tradition that could already provide what they are searching for.

v). Yes! to distinguish between valuable tradition and harmful ones, requires intelligence and judgement is required. It is not possible that all traditions are important and valuable for example in some parts of Pakistan Honor Killing: The murder of a family member typically a female who is perceived to have brought "shame" upon the family while some cultures historically accepts this. Although this is a wrong tradition morally as well as legally but it is appreciated because people have no intellectual judgement whatsoever. So the real intelligence and judgement is required in such cases.

Limits of Expert Knowledge

The writer argues that as the knowledge is becoming more specialize we face more problems of dealing with humanity. We turn to experts to get particular answers but forget that they are master of one trade not the whole life. They

See the world via their expertise and yet fail to see important aspects of life.

This specialization has also eroded common sense, making people overly dependent on technical authority for basic life decisions. True wisdom requires integrating specialized knowledge with a ~~too~~ broader perspective, encouraging interdisciplinary thinking and valuing ordinary human judgement. Without this, society risks becoming a collection of experts who know more and more about less and less, brilliant but blind to the whole.
