3. Conclusion

Childhood is a period of learning, playing, and child's moral, ethical, physical, and intellectual development. In that period children work is like crime of humanity.

In developing countries children are not given much importance, they are being exploited, and victims of labour. As Constitution protect children rights by prohibiting hazardous work and allowing special state provisions for child welfare, but child labour ^{remains} ~~is~~ continuously neglecting issue, because government prioritizing economy rather than child labour issue and laws are poorly enforced globally.

Moreover, lack of children's education as well as parents lack of awareness of effects of child labour. Furthermore, the voice of poor and marginalized people rarely heard and limited media coverage are the reasons due to which child labour is a neglected issue. Globally, child labour is a neglected issue due to prioritizing other political, social, and economic issues rather than child labour, lack of children education and parental awareness.

To conclude, child labour is neglected issue worldwide because of lack of parental awareness, children education, and government prioritizing political and economic issues rather than child labour. Child labour is normal in many societies and most of the societies focus on visible issues than child labour. Voice of poor and marginalized people rarely heard, corruption and weak administration also leads to neglect of child labour. Child labour is also low cost labour and poorly discussed at international forums. It must be prioritized to protect children from physical damage and mental health problems. Children should be given their rights. It is necessary to protect children from labour to make countries socially, politically, and economically developed and progressive. To protect children, some actions should be taken by government at national and international level.
