~~The author characterized the nature of human memory~~

①

The author characterizes the nature of human memory as not only the observer of ^{past and} daily life events but also the implier of their respective experience, identity and their interdependent relationship between humans and their societies. The memory retains the incidents according to their implications.

②

The memory is described as both reconstructive and selective because the memory retains those incidents of life that are shaped by their influence, traditions and their emotional wellbeing. Moreover, the pleasant experiences of life reshapes their perspective regarding their memory. So, human memory is both reconstructive and selective.

~(03)~

Collective memory play a significant role in shaping societal understanding. The perspective of an individual in society's framework depends on their interactions. The traditions, heritage and culture of any society helps the community to understand their past but the selective nature of memory influenced by emotions, experiences and interactions has ~~observed~~ vagued societal understanding.

~(04)~

According to the passage, memory is deeply influenced by the emotions of human. The incidents or experiences of past grounded in extreme joy or fear have imposed a long lasting impact on ~~their~~ retention power of memory. However, those experiences that lack emotional factor are hardly remembered.

~(05)~

Multiple scholars who study memory states that the stories of human is the shadow of their past and present personalities. What they have perceived in past, shapes their present identity. Hence, memory is inseparable from identity.
