Question # 02

Precis :

Title :

Importance of Wholeness of Knowledge over Speciality

The writer compares the medieval practices, where they had knowledge of everything, with today's world of speciality that ignores the broader picture and sticks to narrow path. Modern practices of specialized knowledge have created the strong contradictions with intellectual life. Whenever face any problem, one run towards the expert of that field. Every specialist ~~of~~ because of its nature of work sees ~~that~~ world through its own lens of the discipline of ~~the~~ ^{its} speciality. As a result, they miss the other side of the story and one considers that partial truth as a whole story. By breaking up knowledge into fragments, one is unable to distinguish that the problem actually falls into which category of speciality.

take an example of climate change. The thinkers of medieval time had unified ~~an~~ view of all the knowledge.

Today, overreliance on experts have weakened the trust on ordinary intellectual human. One runs towards the expert for an ordinary thing and this approach makes them childish consumers who simply accept what expert feed them.

The writer highlights that by getting back to wholeness ~~of~~ in thinking does not mean to ignore speciality but to bring that knowledge under the understanding of human life and value.

In schools and universities, they need to think beyond their subjects.

Unless wholeness of knowledge brings back together, the world will rely on experts who excel in details but lack in broader understanding.
