Ques # 2

Precis Writing

Title:

The Limitations of Specialization and the Need for Holistic Thought.

Lost Wholeness in Modern Intellectual Culture

Modern intellectual life is tarnished by a contradiction. Knowledge becomes more specialized, we lose the ability to address fundamental human issues. Experts in specific fields often possess a narrow vision, mistaking partial truths - such as economic rationality or biological reproduction - for the entirety of human experience. This fragmentation prevents us from solving complex problems like climate change, which is multidimensional and requires a unified approach that current specialized institutions cannot provide. Furthermore, our over-reliance on experts has eroded trust in common sense and personal judgement, turning active citizens into passive consumers of technical advice for even the most basic life activities. To remedy this, we must not reject expertise but rather integrate it into a broader understanding of human values. We need an educational shift toward interdisciplinary thinking and a renewed faith

10/20

(1) Ans: Fundamental error:

The author identifies a "simplistic dichotomy" where tradition and progress are viewed as opposing forces - the former seen as a "dead hand" stifling innovation and the latter as energy breaking free from constraints. This is dangerous because it creates an "intellectual trap" that ignores accumulated wisdom and leaves society "rootless" and "vulnerable" to passing fads.

(2) Ans Historical examples:

The author cites the European Renaissance where scholars looked back to classical antiquity to move forward, and religious reformers who used ancient texts to ground revolutionary visions. These show that genuine progress involves "creative reappropriation" of the past rather than its rejection.

(3) Ans Living Conversation:

This phrase means tradition is not a fixed set of "dead customs" but an active "dialogue".

It is a process where the present generation questions the past and the past provides insights to challenge current views, allowing for growth and adaptation.

(4) Ans Paradox of Meaning:

Modern individuals frantically seek identity and meaning in "exotic spiritualities" or "therapeutic techniques" yet, they often despise the very traditions that could provide what they seek.

This reveals a society that is "untethered" and "emanipated from history" but ultimately spiritually impoverished.

(5) Ans Critical Justification:

Yes, such a distinction is possible through the "real intelligence and judgement" mentioned.

While we are influenced by contemporary perspectives, the "living conversation" with the past allows us to evaluate which traditions embody "hard-won wisdom" and which "enshrine injustice," preventing us from being blinded by modern "simplistic slogans".

Ques #7

Translation

5/10

Literature is the <sup>spiritual</sup> pulse of any society, reflecting its moral and spiritual state. When a nation's literature begins to decline, it should be understood that the nation is approaching its decline. Unfortunately, today's literature has become commercialized and has been seized by the mafia. A writer who sells his pen for money actually sells his conscience. A true man of letters is one who raises the voice of truth and wields the pen against the falsehood, regardless of the sacrifices required. However, in this era, such courageous writers are non-existent. Most writers are seen bowing at the threshold of power, engaged in the futile effort of pleasing powerful classes through their writings. This is a betrayal of literature and treason against the nation.
