Learning is not just limited to formal standards or methods; individuals can learn through multiple informal ways. Informal learning is possible through social interactions of individuals in places other than formal institutions. These individuals exchange knowledge regarding all aspects of life. They acquire communication, co-operation and analytical skills. Although, disagreements exist among them, they learn to resolve them through dialogue. Resultantly, they learn to adjust their opinion and accept dissent.

Moreover, social interactions enable masses to cooperate; enhance their confidence; and effectively act in unknown situations. Further, individuals learn to make wise decisions.

Recently, a concern regarding diminishing modes of learning has also been raised because of an increase in social alienation of people; however, some analyst view that informal ways of learning are evolving while preserving their essential function which is enabling masses to learn.
