ANSWER 1

The author identifies that there exists a fundamental error or misconception in the popular imagination regarding relationship between tradition and progress which is, that we have been taught to view these two forces as locked in eternal opposition with tradition representing the past seeking a stifle innovation, and progress representing the dynamic energy of the future breaking free from obsolete constraints. This error led us to a dangerous intellectual trap. Now we know that a tree does not grow taller by cutting itself off from its roots; neither does a civilization. What we call tradition is not a static repository of dead customs but a living conversation across generations, a dialogue in which the present interrogates the past and the past challenges the present. When we sever this conversation, declaring ourselves emancipated from history, we do not become free rather become rootless untethered, vulnerable to every passing fad and ideological wind.

ANSWER 2

The author used historical examples of Great Renaissance, religious reformers and the scientific revolutions that often involved the recovery of ~~my~~ classical antiquity, ancient texts and neglected insights that moved forward into modernity without complete rejection of the past. This challenged the notion that progress requires abandoning the past. Genuine progress requires roots. A tree does not grow taller by cutting itself off from its roots and neither does a civilization. What we call tradition is not a static repository of dead customs but a living conversation across generations, a dialogue in which the present interrogates the past and past challenges the present. When this conversation is severed and declaring ourselves emancipated from history, it does not make us free rather we become rootless, unmoored to every passing fad and ideological wind.

ANSWER 3

The writer means by describing tradition as "a living conversation across generations" rather than "a static repository of dead customs, that tradition is not merely cluster of some old practices or dead hand of the past seeking to stifle innovation or even conservatism rather it embodies hard-won wisdom that deserves preservation.

Now what we call tradition, is not a static repository of dead customs but a living conversation across generations, is actually a dialogue in which the present interrogates the past and the past challenges the present. When this conversation is severed and we declare ourselves emancipated from history, it does not makes us free rather it makes us rootless, untethered, vulnerable to every passing fad and ideological wind.

ANSWER 4

The paradox that exists in the modern search for meaning is that the modern world is full of people frantically seeking meaning, purpose and identity in exotic spiritualities, therapeutic techniques, and political movements never suspecting that what they seek might be found in the traditions they have been taught to despise. This is not to argue for blind adherence to tradition or against innovation. Rather, it is to insist that the relationship between the past and future is more subtle and complex than our crude categories allow. This reveals that some traditions embody hard-won wisdom and deserve preservation while others enshrine injustice and demand abolition. Some innovations represent general advances while others are merely fashions that will improve ephemeral.

ANSWER 5.

I disagree such distinction between valuable traditions and harmful ones is possible. I believe that we are inevitably biased by our own contemporary perspectives in a way that some traditions embody hard-won wisdom and deserve preservation while others enshrine injustice and demand abolition. Some innovations represent general advances genuine advances while others are merely fashions that will prove ephemeral. The difficult task, the task that requires real intelligence and judgement is to distinguish between them, and this task becomes impossible when we approach it armed with nothing but simplistic slogans about tradition versus progress.

QUESTION NO 2

Lost Wholeness in Modern Intellectual Culture

TITLE : A BROKEN MIRROR WITH DISTORTED REFLECTION OF PART OF THE TRUTH

The modern worship of expertise has created a strange contradiction in our intellectual life. As knowledge became more specialized, we found ourselves less able to deal with the basic problems that face humanity. We turn to different specialists of different professions who see the world through particular lens of his own discipline when we want to know about human welfare. Each of the lens reveals an impartial truth. The medical thinker had something we had lost which was a unified view of the world in which all different kinds of knowledge fitted in one coherent picture. We have given a great authority to these experts, asking about basic human activities as they need some technical training for, which weakened our trust in common sense and our wisdom. This dependence has turned us from active citizens into passive consumers.

We need people and institutions that can put the knowledge in its proper place beneath broader understanding of human life and values.
