1) Conclusion.

The Essay:

In the Shakespeare's drama "Hamlet", the main character offers timeless advise to his son, Lausietus, that ~~"Neither be a lender nor a borrower" warning of the bad consequences of debt and aid.~~

The quote is about loan, not about aid. Aid isn't to be returned.

The main character, Polonius, emphasizes upon the point that borrowed and begged money brings short-term relief and luxury but cost the people their independence and social standing. In the contemporary world this advise is reflected in the ills of foreign aid, which compromises the developmental spending of a nation by worsening the human development index, exacerbating the already-present marginalisation and increasing the number of unemployed people. Besides the crisis of development, foreign aid is the new method of development colonialism in developing countries where it supports the colonial elite, used to dominate the important resources and bury their sovereignty. Foreign aid brings economic disasters in a country by creating never-ending cycle of debt trap, seeking protectionism for certain corporations and sustaining flawed taxation policies in the economy of that country. However, a number of critics cite the foreign aid as a tool of stabilising the economy of a country as foreign aid provides balance of payment. Moreover, these critics also consider foreign aid as essential to attract investment in a developing economy. However, foreign aid is a recipe for disaster rather than road to stability because it cuts the development spending, creates neocolonialism and worsen economic crisis in developing world.

To begin with, foreign aid is the external financial support that is sought by the countries to support their economy. It includes aid, loans and grants which differ from each other regarding their conditionalities and the time of return. This external financial support is either given by a country or a multilateral organization.

Foreign Aid is not necessarily financial. It comes in the form of resources, technology and exports.

According to Organization of Economic Cooperation and Development (OECD), America and

Your topic is about aid, not loans.

China holds the record of the nation that has given more than 70% of the global aid. Moreover, multi-national corporation International Monetary Fund (IMF) has given 52% of the global loans.

In this By using these tools, foreign the developed world and organizations use foreign aid to further their interests that makes them it a recipe for disaster.

When foreign aid is injected into the accounts of a country, it compromises the spending of their budget on development projects. It is done by deteriorating human development, women and children development programmes. As a result of reduction in expenditure, women and children who are already neglected segment in third-world countries, face retarded mental and intellectual growth. Structural Adjustment Programmes (SAPs) can be taken as a case study in this regard. SAPs binds the aid-seeking nations to cut their expenditure for attracting further aid. Resultantly, the countries like Pakistan reduce expenditures on women and children projects resulting in their marginalisation.

Besides marginalising women and childrens, foreign aid worsen unemployment in a country. Instead of creating jobs, the governments cut the number of seats to preserve security for seeking loans. Moreover, the indebted government reduces the number of departments as a symbol of austerity measures which further decrease the opportunities for youth to join the workforce. As a matter of fact, 95000 jobs were lost in South Korea in 1997 because of seeking loan from IMF. Resultantly, the unemployment increased in South Korea indicating an inverse relation between foreign aid and employment opportunities.

Properly introduce the argument for the topic sentence debt and aid is a tactic devised by the neocolonial powers. The developed world uses debt and aid as weapons to sustain their dominance in the world which makes external finances a recipe for disaster. It can be indicated from the support of loan-giving international bodies to colonial statecraft in the developing world.

Aid, loans and grants flow from rich countries to the rich people in poor countries. we use the external loans to support extractive institutions that results in the accumulation of wealth in the hands of colonial elite. According to United Nation Development Programme (UNDP), foreign aid flows into the stream of oligarchic elite which is already consuming more than 60% of GDP of Pakistan. It indicates that foreign ^{finance} sustains the rule of the few people like the colonial institutions which results in disastrous on the strategic resources of a country.

foreign aid and debt are used by neocolonial powers to monopolize the strategic resources of a nation. Initially, countries and organizations support the economy of developing nations by lending them loans, aid and grants when the countries are unable to pay those loans, lending bodies demand access to the strategic minerals of that country. In 2022, when Sri Lankan

Banks went default, the lending bodies demanded Hambantota port

in return of loans, which is a hub
of strategic minerals of Indian ocean. In this way, neocolonial bodies still command the world through aid and debts which undermines the sovereign authority of the nations.

Foreign aid is disastrous
to the sovereignty of a country.

It is because of the reason that external lending bodies create the external oversight on the national security of a country. When a country tries to independently decide its security affairs, which are against the interest of lending bodies,
they use these neocolonial economic tools to coerce that country into obedience. In his book "The Line of Fire", President of Pakistan
Pervez Musharraf explains that America threatened to stop aid if Pakistan would not provide him the military bases. It suggests that foreign aid is used to undermine the sovereignty of Pakistan.

Besides creating neocolonialism, foreign aid brings economic disaster in a country. Foreign aid creates Sisiphran cycle of debt trap. The main reason due to external loans, economy is stabilised in the initial stages. However, when the reserves deplete, budgetary crisis is created. In order to tackle this situation, the country seeks further debt which results in never-ending cycle of debt. It is the reason that Pakistan has to persistently move to IMF as its economy has been locked in disastrous trap of debt.

Secondly, foreign aid brings economic disaster by destroying competitive markets of the borrowing nation. In the liberal world order, economy grows when multiple companies compete resulting in generation of national wealth. However, when a country undertakes the foreign loans, the lender demands preferential access of its indigenous companies to the markets of indebted nation. Resultantly, the foreign companies belonging to the lending nations prevail in the markets of the developing world. It further leads to protectionist economy that is destructive to the economic framework of a country.

Moreover, foreign aid brings persistent fiscal imbalance in the economy of an indebted state. The primary reason is that taxation bodies become habitual to the aid neglecting the need of proper taxation mechanism. Secondly, a majority of collected revenues is utilized in the payment of interest on foreign loans. In the budget 2025-26, Rs. 11 billion tax was collected out of which more than Rs. 8 billion was paid to the lending countries creating a persistent issue of fiscal imbalance in Pakistan.

Contrary to the thesis that foreign aid is a recipe for disaster, a number of critics hold the view that ~~foreign aid~~ is a road to stability by providing following arguments:

First argument by those critics is the notion that ~~foreign aid~~ stabilises the economy of a country. They argue that when the reserves of a country are in the declining phase, ~~foreign aid~~ stabilise those declining reserves resulting in maintaining balance of payment. In 2022, when Pakistan ~~was at the brink of default~~, IMF loans stabilised the reserves and supported balance of payment in Pakistan.

Secondly, external aid increases investment in the country. When ~~foreign loans~~ are injected into the market of a country, it boosts the investors' confidence. As a result, investment in different sectors of the aid-seeking nation is increased.

Moreover, investment improves the stock exchange of the indebted state indicating a direct relation between foreign aid, investment and progress of economy.

Thirdly, conditionalities associated with foreign aid are not a form of dictation but are the pathways to stability. The terms and conditions mandate the loan-seeking nation to bring structural reforms in their economy when the nation widens the tax base, privatise the assets and liberalises its monetary fiscal policy, private sector pools in investment resulting in stable economic growth indicating that foreign aid is a road to stability.

Lastly, critics argue that external financial supports brings evidence?

environmental stability which is a part of economic stability. A number of global lending bodies prefer loans in the field of climate change. When the developing nations unlock such loans, it helps them to adapt to the adverse impacts of climate change. Resultantly, the economic cost of disaster is decreased, and investment is attracted in the field of green energy which leads to stability.

Above points are unsubstantiated because they lack factual support.

Therefore, it is proved that foreign aid is a recipe of disaster. First, foreign aid and loans bring short-term respite. They bring stability and investment for the short period. It can be proved from case study of Sri Lanka where external aid led to progress from 1970-1975. However, the eventual debt trap led to default in 2022 indicating that foreign aid is a pathway of disaster.

Secondly, prosperity cannot be engineered through foreign aid. A number of critics argue that it brings financial stability and structural reforms. However, case study of Afghanistan and Syria negates this notion. Despite billions of aid in these countries, their structure remained extractive which failed to be transformed into prosperity. Thus, prosperity and stability cannot be engineered through foreign aid.

To sum up all the facts, which have been stated, foreign aid is a recipe for disaster as it compromises development, favours neocolonialism and exacerbates economic crisis in the indebted nation. According to some critics, foreign aid is a road to stability as it brings reforms in economic framework, and supports environmental stability. However, foreign aid is a short-term sacrifice for never-ending cycle of debt trap. Secondly, foreign aid is a method to engineer prosperity which cannot lead to stability. Thus, foreign aid is like tentacles of an octopus which must be razed to ensure sustainable growth.
