Modern Reliance on experts has created a serious contradiction in society in dealing with basic problems. People must have knowledge of economics, science and other fields. Each experts look at problems through his own lens. For an economist, humans are benefit seekers, for a biologist, humans are gene carrier, and so on. It appears that these views are truth, but in reality a single problem demands knowledge from various fields. People consult experts about how they should live their lives, which shows their dependency on experts and their weak independent thinking. Institutions must provide them broad conceptual understanding rather than pushing learners into narrow fields. Faith in integrated knowledge helps in making sound decisions about common problems. Until people manage to put knowledge together again, they shall keep following experts who know details about less and less but blind to the larger picture.
