

A thing of beauty is a joy forever

Mankind is created to find and inculcate beauty in the universe to share joy with those around them. The nature of a human-being compels him to add beauty in his work. Therefore, man loves to be surrounded with beautiful things in his environment. For instance, nature in its any aspect: day or night, rain or sun, spring or autumn, mountains or sea bears beauty and charm in it. A person likes to remain fascinated by the nature because it brings joy, happiness and peace of mind. This joy and peace of mind bring out his creativity which multiplies his joy with every new invention of him. The invention, in turn, benefits the generations following him and it becomes an ultimate joy. One example is the fountain pen invented by Lewis Watermans to prevent ink leakage and a consistent ink flow while writing.

His invention enhanced the beauty of his work which brought joy to the generations afterwards. Another example is of the invention of type writer by a newspaper editor Christopher Latham Sholes. He transformed written communication by his invention which allowed ^{the} uniform printing of letters on a paper and therefore, added beauty to his work. This invention of beauty rejoiced the generations to come. Hence, a thing of beauty is a joy forever.